3 Things Parents Should Know

1. Just because you're friends with your child on Facebook, doesn't mean you're able to see everything they post. Users have control over who can see the content they share. If you're worried about what your child may be posting, talk to them about what it means to build a healthy digital reputation.
2. Keep up with privacy settings on Facebook with Privacy Checkup. This is a helpful refresher to see what apps are connected to your account, what personal information you have visible, and more.
3. Facebook has a Bully Prevention Hub with resources for parents, teens, and educators. It covers how to take action if you or someone you know is being bullied online, how to talk with them about the problem, and how to use the tools available on Facebook to find a solution.
